ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I wish to first and foremost acknowledge Dr Jennifer Lees-Marshment from Politics and International Relations at the University of Auckland. I will forever be indebted to Jennifer for providing me with unbelievable support and feedback on the research presented in this book. Dr Lees-Marshment also proactively helped me seek opportunities such as writing this book, which would not exist without her. I wish to also acknowledge Geoff Kemp from Politics and International Relations at the University of Auckland for providing expertise and a valuable alternative perspective on the research that is presented in this book. I also wish to acknowledge my father, Hon Jack Elder, and my mother, the late Claire Girling-Butcher. As a child, I severely struggled with reading and writing. So doing something like write a book did not seem likely. My parents took a proactive approach to making sure my reading and writing improved. Also, they raised me in a home where a fascination with politics, and political strategy, was considered the norm. Finally, I would like to acknowledge Sir Bob Harvey, Mark Blackham, Peter Fenn, and David Farrar. These gentlemen provided their valuable time and expertise, in interview form, that helped add further weight and a practical perspective to the theory of this book.
